The "Vector Clock" (or "vector clock") is a family of concepts in distributed computing that helps maintain the timestamps of remote systems that are being synchronized with each other. It is used in many synchronization applications, such as "Push Notifications", "Creation and Deletion of Entities", "Multicast Messages", and "Events". If you are wondering exactly what a "vector clock" is, here is a definition from Wikipedia: "A vector clock is a distributed system data structure that maintains the current time for entities that are distributed through multiple locations. It represents a global time, which can be compared with the current time at a particular location by f678ea9f9e
